■ The trial was staged in the court of a local justice of the peace. The plaintiff, who had been injured in a minor accident, was represented by one of our lesser legal lights. The witness had told all he knew of the accident and his testimony was somewhat damaging to the cause of the plaintiff. The lesser legal light took the witness. "You say you seen the accident?" he asked truculently. "No," answered the witness, who had just described the accident minutely. "Do you sit there and tell about this accident and then deny you said you seen it?" shouted the lawyer. "I did not say that." "Then what did you say?" "I said I saw it." It required some moments to compose the courtroom.
